FAQ

Q1: What is the difference between direct and circumstantial evidence?

A1: Direct evidence directly proves a fact, such as eyewitness testimony placing the defendant at the scene of a crime. Circumstantial evidence, on the other hand, requires inference. For instance, finding the defendant's fingerprints at the scene suggests involvement but doesn't definitively prove guilt. Both types of evidence are used in criminal trials, but their weight and persuasiveness can differ significantly.

Q2: How does the burden of proof differ between civil and criminal cases?

A2: In criminal cases, the prosecution bears the burden of proving guilt "beyond a reasonable doubt," a very high standard. In civil cases, the burden of proof is typically "preponderance of the evidence," a significantly lower standard. This difference reflects the higher stakes involved in criminal prosecutions, where the potential penalty is significantly greater.

Q3: What is the exclusionary rule, and how does it apply in practice?

A3: The exclusionary rule dictates that evidence obtained illegally cannot be admitted in court. This rule aims to deter law enforcement

Q4: What are some common grounds for appealing a criminal conviction?
